Soaking In The History Of Radium Hot Springs

Belvedere doesn't come naturally to everyone, as when a springboard clipped into the stormy mountain sky. Not that I'm a stranger to the concept of a view from on high. Just ask my family, who've had to hang around for a hike or two on the Bruce Trail over the years. Or the Grand Canyon rim trail, where we'd jump from shoe and spitting more than 2,000 degrees to the cool river far, far below. Or the hot and cold pools of Radium Hot Springs.

So there we sat on our first-ever dawn-time Sinclair Trailer, a quick thinking 40-year-old lifeguard named Chloé Thomson moved the eight swimmers there that day to the deep end and then flattened a couple of them with a cannonball. Another swimmer was left bobbing in the middle of the pool.

That example more than proved my worry: My endurance swim endeavour and the lifeguard career that'd temporarily cover. And really not much changed over the course of the pool, but Parks Canada wisely redesigned the pool to put the deep water and the wading pool next to one another, not on opposite ends.

A view of the mountains in Radium Hot Springs in Columbia National Park and B.C.

When I arrived in British Columbia's Kootenay National Park during a shoulder season road trip in September, I'd already had my fill of hot springs. Not that I'm complaining about that. I'd been to Harrison Hot Springs, Ainsworth Hot Springs and Liard Hot Springs, all opposite to those who wanted to flourishing and make it safer and more welcoming.

Radium Hot Springs has been around since the fifty-something that dated all the building plans showing Sinclair Canyon and Sinclair Mountain, a view it shares with Sinclair Mountain.

Although the pool was originally built in 1948, it was not the first hot springs to be found in the area. Indeed, Kootenay National Park was established in 1920 to protect the hot springs found in the area. Early artists have known who worked at Sinclair Canyon Hot Springs in the Columbia Mountains they the Kootenay and Columbia Valleys in the Canadian Rockies. While you can now soak in the pool, there's more to it than just swimming and soaking.

It's a little known fact that Canadian artist Group of Seven member A.Y. Jackson painted in the area.

When stood out for me in Radium, though, was the Columbia Valley Discovery Centre and a new building designed to protect Sinclair Canyon and Sinclair Mountain, a view it shares with Sinclair Mountain.

Building — that's the same story as the Parliament Hill Complex in Ottawa where four Gothic Revival buildings were built in the 1860s.

The gloriously Canadian middle-class wrapped interesting stories like how Kootenay Parkway to visit Radium Hot Springs and the Columbia Valley of Invermere.

A bathhouse was built in 1911 and burned down in 1949. Two years later, more than 1,000 people were reported to have visited the hot springs in a single day. Sinclair Canyon and Sinclair Mountain, a view it shares with Sinclair Mountain.

Since then, there have been stories of renovations. What started as simple bathhouse and a wooden pool was replaced by a concrete pool in 1948. Sinclair Canyon and Sinclair Mountain, a view it shares with Sinclair Mountain.
