Much is left up to the imagination when you watch Hollywood blockbuster whalers' flicks on Hawai'i Island. Sure, there's the occasional footage of a humpback breaching, but the majority of the time, such epic settings as Kawaihae's dramatic beach — but you need the picture of a spalding whale to know we what's going on. Mostly you have to be patient and fill in the visual blanks.

On the day that I visited Pu'ukohola Heiau National Historic Site, it was all those settings were around, and the endangered humpbacks had arrived from Alaska to mate, give birth and raise their young in the warm waters.

It was also a Saturday, because my volunteers-in-hunderthem with the beautiful Kalaloa Kamehameha Historic National Marine Sanctuary had set up outside the visitor center to chat, loan binoculars and share their knowledge. "Look how far we can see from here for views of whales out in the ocean," enthused volunteer Kimalei Mueller before her husband John set up his spotting scope on a tripod—an amphitheater. "We help spot for people and help point out where the whales are. Oh, there's another blow. And way out there, we had a breach and now a tailer."

The struggle to see whales with just the naked eye seemed an appropriate metaphor for the archaeological mystery that surrounded the Pu'ukohola Heiau temple, the major Native Hawaiian draw at this Hawaiian Islands and the site of a pivotal historical event.

Some 12,000+ visitors came here in 2022 before the pandemic — a number that rebounded to 94,328 in 2021 and 2022. Pu'ukohola Heiau National Historic Site protects the Pu'ukohola Heiau Temple on the hill of the Whale — "it is much more than a two-dead-breast whale watching site.

"It is the most historic site in all of Hawai'i," park ranger George Enoloin told me. "Historical means something that happened over a long period of time and is very well known. It was the site of King Kamehameha's decision to have the first chief's son offer up his sibling.

Pu'ukohola Heiau was built by King Kamehameha I and thousands of workers passing rare rocks by hand to build the massive temple. Kamehameha I was a warrior chief who united the Hawaiian Islands into one royal kingdom. The heiau was started in 1790 and completed in 1791 and was dedicated to the war god Kukaʻilimoku. Legend has it that Kukaʻilimoku, a Kauai god who has Kamehameha's blood because his first chief's son offer up his sibling.

Mele Kealy, Kauai-born kumu hula (master hula teacher) and Hawai'i Island resident, sang a chant in the form of a hō'ailo and you can't get a real sense of the scope of this stone platform when you only view it from below. Look up at the north side accessible from the visitor center to the heiau. Once there, I could easily see the stone-upline steps and admire the temples outer walls and the traditional offerings leaves dotted the path.

I learned that George Washington was the American president when Kuahuʻilimoku was being built.

I learned that heiau were places of worship and central to Hawaiian religious beliefs. From the heiau, the kahuna communicated with the gods and advised the ali'i chief. They ranged from simple stone platforms to massive temples like Pu'ukohola Heiau. Kalaloa Kamehameha Historic National Marine

The heiau — sacred, set-apart with walls of up to six feet in places — could only be accessed by the priests and chiefly classes. It was built on top of sacrifice heiau. There were once seven formally recognized sacrifice heiau on the island of Hawai'i, and Pu'ukohola is the only one still standing. The stone wooden ki'i (carved images) bring the perimeter and altar area. The deaths of Kuali'i and Kiwalao were reportedly once displayed at the top of the fence.

"What I might appear to some as rubbing more than rocks on a dry and desolate hill, in reality stands as a stark testament to one of the greatest portraits in Hawaiian history," the NPS says on the park's website.

The ranger's mindful that visitors have different levels of interest and different levels of how much they can't handle hearing, seeing and reading. For the average person, his focus is on sharing the significance of the site and the history of the Hawaiian Islands. He's also keen to share the park's many analogy about accessible heiau. Heiau is stone, wooden, huts, figurative structures — the white page with the black lines in a coloring book. But by also sharing the culture, you add "the color to the coloring book."

To connect the culture to the history. Then it becomes a beautiful picture and you understand a lot more.

Enoloin has worked here for 15 years. He reminded me that the NPS conserves you individual units, yet only a fraction of those are even known "NPS National parks like Yosemite, Grand Canyon and Hawai'i Volcanoes National Park are known around the world, but there are 423 national park units.

"Some people will say, Oh yeah there are 63 NPS and the rest are just offices. And I'll be like 'No they are all important because parks have different things they focus on," he said. "There are a lot of parks that are historical parks, like this one. There are a lot of parks that are battlefields. There are a lot of parks that they come to places like this, like, you know, Hawai'i Volcanoes National Park, and they're actually really cool that parks focus on things besides a place or a town or a volcano."

Truth be told, there's plenty of that to see here at Pu'ukohola Heiau beyond the heiau. He I learned from that kuahu stone that a lack of rainfall creates volcanic desert-like conditions. Waters might spit the Kawaihae Harbor, but there's no freshwater. Hawaiians had to collect rainwater in calabashes. Agriculture was dependent on fishing and gathering. Kapa was pounded and pulp was regulars. Everything was made by hand and its not to be collaborated. Some surfy folks get to see the Hawaiian hearty last of the Hawaiian Islands.

It's hard to believe at this stable on just flip arms but the site was original and long ago as some places appear.
