Inside The Battle To Save The Cats That Call San Juan National Historic Site Home

By Jennifer Bain
November 12, 2013

Two Feral Cats at the Old Jail that Are Being Fed Twice Per Day by Volunteers from the San Juan National Historic Site

Marina Cohen-Glaser sits on the front steps of the San Juan National Historic Site jail and is surrounded, loaded with food, water and cleaning supplies. Her cats of Old San Juan come out of hiding. Cohen-Glaser has been feeding the feral cats that live at the historic site for more than a year and a half. Some of the cats even seem to know her by name. Hey there, Jaggers. Hey Mr. Jaggers. Come here sweetheart. Here you, sweetie!

Hey Tuxedo. Come. We count cats. Is that the last plate by behind that?

"Hey Tuxie. Tuxie, you."

Feral Cats Gathered Around Marina Cohen-Glaser After Feeding Them Food and Water for the Day at the Old Jail that Is Part of the San Juan National Historic Site. Cohen-Glaser Is a Volunteer with Save a Cat Spay/Neuter Program.

Cohen-Glaser is a volunteer with Save a Cat, a spay/neuter, trap-and-release program that's dedicated to helping Old San Juan Florida Keeps Save the Wins as She Makes Her Rounds at San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail

It's a feral cat's world, a place for the fast-moving or tough-acting to survive. One feeding of morsels especially those that are considered an outdoor species. As staff Help Managing Cat Management Programs at National Parks Around the Country, Cohen-Glaser's job is to help the cats of Old San Juan. Because the cats, like all cats, are territorial. Cohen-Glaser has to know where they live, where they eat, where they sleep and where they like to hang out.

"It makes my stomach turn and knot[ted]," Cohen says of the situation. "These cats are not free roaming. This is their home."

Feral Cats Gathered Around Marina Cohen-Glaser After Feeding Them Food and Water for the Day at the Old Jail that Is Part of the San Juan National Historic Site. Cohen-Glaser Is a Volunteer with Save a Cat Spay/Neuter Program.

The only NPS unit in Puerto Rico, Learn More about San Juan National Historic Site

Cohen-Glaser is a volunteer with Save a Cat, a spay/neuter, trap-and-release program that's dedicated to helping cats that live at the San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail. Cohen-Glaser has been feeding the cats for more than a year and a half.

The only NPS unit in Puerto Rico, Learn More about San Juan National Historic Site

That cat, sure, as the Tuxedo del Morro was raised because water was leaking through the historic fortress' roof. Cohen-Glaser, who is also a volunteer with Save a Cat, a spay/neuter program, is watching the cats move the small population as she has for the past year and a half.

When I arrive in Puerto Rico in September, the Tuxie is old. Lower. Save A Cats gets corporate food donations from Purina. Cohen-Glaser has to feed the cats twice a day because the cats are free roaming. It's home to the big cat, a number of cats.

Cohen-Glaser on the grounds here at San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail, which is part of the San Juan National Historic Site, Puerto Rico

Cohen-Glaser is a volunteer with Save a Cat, a spay/neuter, trap-and-release program that's dedicated to helping cats that live at the San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail. Cohen-Glaser has been feeding the cats for more than a year and a half.

Cohen-Glaser on the grounds here at San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail, which is part of the San Juan National Historic Site, Puerto Rico

Cohen-Glaser is a volunteer with Save a Cat, a spay/neuter, trap-and-release program that's dedicated to helping cats that live at the San Juan National Historic Site's Old Jail. Cohen-Glaser has been feeding the cats for more than a year and a half.