Farming With Ancient Acequias At San Antonio Missions

By Jennifer Ellen
June 22, 2022

At Mission San Juan, Superintendent Chalres Andrew and Ranger Sandy Sanchez stand at the head gate to a 1.5-mile acequia that irrigates the mission's farm fields. Jennifer Ellen/NPT

With a planting date on the horizon, Ranger Sandy Sanchez and Superintendent Chalres Andrew walk the dusty path between a restored mission church and a farm field. Sanchez points to a small, rectangular hole in the ground.

"That's the hole I dug with the shovel that the Boy Scouts gave me for my 21st birthday," Sanchez recounts, finally understanding how the simple but mysterious method of watering crops that Andrew had explained to him years ago.

But first I had to learn to dig with the right tool — a Spanish-colonial hoe that Sanchez forged in 2001. Acequias are a community, sacred tool. Sanchez brought his daughter to learn by the ritual. Just like brought to learn by the ritual. Just like brought to learn by the ritual. Just like brought